1990s: AGE OF NATIONALISM

If it is good for the nations of Eastern Europe, why is it not good for us?

WITH THE COMING of the 1990s, one thing stands out right across the world: Nationalism is on the upsurge everywhere.

Throughout Eastern Europe, the Soviet satellite states topple one-by-one, as the people reject the failed and discredited marxist system. In Poland, Hungary, East Germany, Czechoslovakia, Rumania and Bulgaria revolutions against Soviet rule have taken place and national independence has been asserted. Even in the Soviet Union itself the constituent republics are striving to break free from Moscow's empire, from the Baltic States in the North West to Azerbaijan in the far South. More nations, for decades imprisoned within that empire, are certain soon to follow suit.

And within the one-time communist states ethnic conflicts are breaking out everywhere. In Azerbaijan there is conflict between the Azeri majority and the Armenian minority. In Yugoslavia, the Serbs, Croats, Slovenes and others are at each other's throats. In Rumania, the Hungarians in the North West are demanding their national rights. Moldavia, annexed by Stalin's Russia after World War II, wants to return to Rumania because most of the people there are of Rumanian stock. In Bulgaria there is conflict between the native Bulgars and the Turks.

All these developments go right against the trends of the 1960s and 1970s, and which seemed to be on course at the start of the 1980s — the trends towards internationalism, 'one world' and racial integration everywhere.

For many years, our own politicians have been telling us that nationalism is out of date, 'old hat'. They've been backed up by our 'educationalists', by the mass media and by the Church. Everywhere throughout these last decades there has been a concerted onslaught against the ideas of national sovereignty, national pride and the preservation of national identity. It would be good for us all, our masters have been telling us, if all the peoples of the world were mixed up into one big international, multi-racial stew — with no national boundaries, no separate races, no independent national governments. Nationalism, they said, was a thing of the past; internationalism was the thing of the future.

To promote this trend, our politicians have conspired to immerse Britain in the European Common Market, and to that end they have gradually handed over control of British affairs to the Common Market bureaucracy. At the same time they have promoted the flooding of Britain with immigrants from all over the Third World: the West Indies, India, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Africa, the Middle East and the Far East. Now they are planning to land another wave of non-white immigrants on us by the importation of the Hong Kong Chinese. All this has been defended on the grounds that the world is now 'multi-racial' and we in Britain have got to follow suit.

PROVED WRONG

How wrong they are now proving to be!

Far from the world becoming more 'international' and 'integrated', it is becoming more national and segregated with every week that goes by. What all these national independence movements everywhere show is that internationalism and multi-racialism simply haven't worked. Everywhere where different races have been forced to live side-by-side, against all their natural inclinations, they have eventually revolted against that state of affairs and asserted their separateness.

As we now watch the Azeris and the Armenians kill each other in the South of the Soviet Union, is there not a lesson in all the bloodshed? The lesson that there is a far better chance of peace between people of different races if they live apart.

What we see happening now in Azerbaijan and elsewhere is going to happen here in Britain if things carry on as they are.

In fact, as we know, they have started to happen already. The 1980s saw ferocious inner-city riots in areas where large concentrations of ethnic minorities had been allowed to gather. And towards the end of the decade we saw a new menace emerging in the form of Islamic militancy, with huge demonstrations in towns and cities up and down the country demanding changes in British law to suit the Moslem newcomers and calling for the murder of a writer who had upset the Moslem community by one of his books.

All these things are the inevitable consequence of multi-racialism — a consequence we have predicted again and again in this paper.

If Britain is to be spared the agonies that we are now witnessing in other parts of the world where incompatible races have been forced to live together, there is only one thing that we can no do: put an end to the multi-

SOUTH AFRICA: THE FACTS BEHIND THE LIES

WITH attention presently focused on black demonstrations against Mike Gatting's cricketers in South Africa, it is an opportune moment to reiterate why this paper has always supported white rule in that country — contrary to the attitude of our politicians and mass media, who regard black 'majority rule' there as if it were holy writ.

There never has been any moral or logical reason why South Africa's Whites should surrender one atom of power to non-Whites. The claim that they should has nothing to support it but an assortment of media-concocted lies that a child should be able to see through, once armed with a few basic facts.

One of these lies is contained in the routine reference by our media hacks to South Africans of Boer and British descent as the 'white minority' — as opposed to what is called the 'black majority'. The implication is that, because the latter have a higher nose-count than the former, this gives them some sort of self-evident 'right' to be in control of the country.

The obvious facts of the case are ignored. South Africa today is a land of efficient farms and factories, towns and cities, sophisticated communications and high technology. In short, it is a western country and not a 'Third World' country needing continual dollops of our aid.

Just whose brains, enterprise and energy were mainly responsible for creating these high standards? Answer: those of the European. It is unthinkable that any of this could have come about without him.

The same is true of whatever there is in the country in the way of order and civilisation. Without the European, the land area that today makes up South Africa would never have been so much as organised into a single unit to which a name could be given. It would have remained a chequerboard of fluctuating tribal fiefdoms, mostly at war with each other — which was how the White Man found it.

As for the so-called 'black majority', this phrase is highly misleading, as is also the description of South Africa's black rebels as 'nationalists'. The Blacks — or rather the country's assorted non-Whites — are not a nation in any sense of the term, and are never likely to become one.

They belong in fact to four entirely separate racial groups, none of which has any love for the others. There are the Black Africans, the Coloureds (of mixed race), the Indians and the stone-age Bushmen of the remote Kalahari Desert regions. The Africans are in turn divided into at least eight tribal groupings, speaking different languages, and then yet again into clans.

In a nutshell, any non-white common front which might seem to exist is an artificial affair, held together only by the common hatred of its members for European civilisation. If once the Europeans, in a fit of weakness, were to yield their power, the non-Whites would be liable quickly to turn on one another.

So in fact, should 'majority rule' come to South Africa, it would be bad for all races — white and non-white alike.

A decade of misery ahead

PAY CLAIMS ARE SET TO GO THROUGH THE ROOF IN THE 1990s. MEANWHILE THE GOVERNMENT ALLOWS THE BANKERS TO GO ON CREATING INFLATION — AT A PROFIT

ALL THE SIGNS ARE that the 1990s are going to be a decade of mounting economic misery for Britain, as the Government tries vainly to keep down the lid on an escalating series of pay claims, fuelled by rising inflation.

At the moment the ambulance drivers' and Ford motor workers' disputes are in the forefront of the news. But these are just the tip of the iceberg. These workers' claims for pay increases are likely to be followed by many more as other occupational groups find their living standards threatened by the rocketing cost of living. NALGO is putting in for a 14 per-cent rise for its white-collar council staff. Vickers workers want 15 per-cent more. Also on the table in the near future will be claims from the 80,000 employed in the clothing industry, 60,000 in furniture manufacturing and yet more among the 350,000 making motors.

And looming a little way ahead are huge claims on behalf of various public sector workers, including doctors, dentists, nurses and midwives and members of the armed forces. Claims are anticipated by the Spring for the 150,000 workers in British Rail and British Steel, more than 400,000 in the civil service, 50,000 in British Gas and more than a million in the retail trade.

MRS. THATCHER
Totally in the grip of the City, she refuses to tackle the real cause of inflation: the creation by the banks of money out of nothing

Add to this claims from teachers, bank staff and workers in the chemical and printing industries. All in all, the Government is in for a year of turmoil, followed no doubt by a decade of even more.

POLITICIANS STICK TO THE OLD ORTHODOXY

Faced with this mounting spiral of pay claims, apologists for the Government are maintaining that it must dig its heels in and resist the claims because to give in to them will send inflation still higher, as well as price British products out of world markets. In other words, they are singing the same old song that they and their ilk have been singing for as long as any of us can remember.

But the facts are very different. In reality, pay claims do not cause inflation; they are merely the inevitable consequence of inflation.

The real culprit in the inflationary spiral is always carefully shielded from public view and public criticism. It is vital to the 'establishment' that this should be so, for if this culprit were properly exposed the whole of the financial racket by which we are ruled would have its cover blown.

And the culprit? Very simply, it is the financial system. It is the traditional method by which the Government (and past Labour Governments as well) have permitted the bankers to maintain their privilege of 'manufacturing' money by the creation of loans out of nothing!

It is by this method that nearly all the new 'money' that is used to expand the economy is brought into being. When a bank makes a loan to the Government, industry or the individual, it does not merely transfer existing money from its possession to the borrower's possession; it creates an entirely new quantity of money that did not exist before.

But when this loan is paid back to the bank it has to be paid in real money — and with interest on top!

Is this just our supposition? No, for the politicians as good as admit the truth of it themselves when they call for, and sometimes apply, an increase in the interest rate "in order to cut down on the money supply and curb inflation."

Now how would an increase in the interest rate cut down on money supply if it were not a fact that we are paying the bankers interest for their creation of our money?

Today nearly all the new money coming into our economy is credit issued by the banks and repayable with interest.

If we think in terms of the total amount of money created in this way, we will immediately see that it can never be repaid — for to repay it would require more money than there is in the entire economy!

So how are these loans repaid? To a large extent by the creation of yet more loans to repay them.

The result, as anyone with an elementary head for figures will understand, is that every year more and more money circulating in our economy is money borrowed from the banks and therefore repayable to the banks.

And, this being so, it means that every year the amount of interest paid in tribute to the banks is also increasing — a kind of latter-day 'Danegeld'.

Very simply, this means that a part of the cost of every item of goods or services for sale has to include an allowance for the money that must be paid in loan-interest to the banks. As the total of this interest increases every year, so are the costs of goods and services bound to increase.

And as these costs of goods and services — the cost of living — increases all the time, workers are bound to have to ask for pay increases to keep up with them.

This is the reality with the ambulance drivers and the Ford workers, as well as all the others for whom pay claims are now in the pipeline.

The situation was summed up by Ford worker Des Heemskirk, speaking to the Sunday Times, when he said:-

> "Inflation in the South East has been more like 35 per-cent. My mortgage payments have gone up from £295 a month to £425. My wife has to go out to work and we still can't make ends meet. We can't even afford to have kids. Just to keep level with rises in the cost of living we need more than 10 per-cent this time."

Mr. Heemskirk was of course referring in his final words to the 10.2 per-cent pat claim for which his union is asking. This claim is being opposed on the grounds that Ford workers in other countries are getting lesser increases. What is not understood is that in these other countries the workers are facing nothing like the same increases in living costs.

THE ONLY ANSWER

There is of course only one answer to this mounting crisis of pay claims and that is for the Government to abandon the antiquated theory that pay claims cause inflation and to tackle inflation at its real source: the faults in the money system.

Banking must be entirely reformed in this country so as to permit the banks to lend only the money they actually have earned by legitimate trading, in other words the money they have in deposit.

For all the new money that we require for an expanding economy, we should rely on the provision by the Government of a creation of interest-free money, not repayable and calculated in accordance with increases in real national wealth.

As long as these calculations are correct, such a practice would not be inflationary. If the calculations err slightly, they can be corrected soon afterwards. The worst that this could cause would be a variable inflation or deflation of less than one per-cent. Over a period of five or ten years, the value of people's money would remain constant.

In this way, regular pay increases could be given as the sum total of national wealth increased. Industrial warfare could become a thing of the past, as the whole basis for such warfare would have been eliminated.

This is the true solution to the present pay crisis. But it is not a solution we have a hope of seeing applied either by this Thatcher Government or any alternative government on the immediate horizon.

For the politicians of all the parties of Westminster are just the pawns of the bankers and the City. They dare not institute policies which would remove the privileges of their masters.

So we face, at the outset of the 1990s, a decade of increasing misery in the sector of pay demands. And the misery will not abate — until there is a revolution against the financial establishment.

A revolution that only we nationalists will ever bring about.

racial society, repatriate the ethnic minorities and restore this country to the native British people!

In just the same way, we must put an end to the insanity of the Common Market, under which this country's national freedom has been handed away, and we must restore to ourselves control over our own affairs — just as the nations of Eastern Europe are doing, just as the people of the non-Russian Soviet republics are doing.

For if national independence and the preservation of national identity are good and right for them, why should it not be good and right for us?

The reality that we are now entering an age of resurgent nationalism was recognised even by such an internationalist and 'liberal' paper as the Sunday Times, when on the 7th January it published an article by regular columnist Simon Jenkins in which the writer said:-

> "...Half a century of liberal pretence that 'all God's children are one' has not won the day. The pretence has brought Marxist-Leninism back to square one of 1918, to the rebuilding of the Tower of Babel.
> "...Philosophers long out of fashion will return to support this yearning for group identity in a shrinking world — men of instinct rather than reason...Of course, we have been here before. The end of each of the past three centuries has seen just such an eerie 'liberal dawn', followed by the shattering of hope.
> "This time we should accept, constitutionally, that people want to maintain their historical ties of tradition, language and territorial integrity — a wish of which nationalism is the political expression. Denied this wish, they will fight. For a century the ruling elites of West and East have indeed denied it, arguing, killing, lying, bankrupting their exchequers in the process. Not this time, I hope."

ANOTHER 'NEW INITIATIVE' IN NORTHERN IRELAND? GOD HELP US!

TAKE COVER NOW! It looks as if yet another 'new initiative' on Northern Ireland is in the offing.

Our politicians apparently are at last coming to recognise that their much-heralded 'Anglo-Irish Agreement', launched in 1985, has been a disastrous failure — something we forecast at the time.

Now it looks as if they're thinking of replacing the Agreement with a new scheme of devolved government centred on Stormont. Such a formula might of course sound different to the countless ones that have been put forward and tried before, but the basic idea is the same: the Westminster Government is trying, as usual, to please everybody. Republicans would of course have a role in this new devolved government scheme just as Unionists would. And of course, as before, the Haughey Government in Dublin has to be consulted.

Mr. Haughey has said that he is prepared to look at the scheme — which sounds ominous.

Of course, whether or not this new formula is adopted, the bombing and the killing by the IRA will carry on just as before.

It will carry on until our politicians, both sides of the Irish Sea, finally recognise that what is needed in Northern Ireland are not 'new initiatives', 'new formulae', new schemes of 'power-sharing', new attempts to get people around a table, but a determined, purposeful and uncompromising campaign to wipe out the terrorists once and for all!

FLOODTIDE!

Coming 'refugee' wave will make past influx look like a trickle

ARE YOU one of those millions of people in Britain who think that the influx of 'refugees' from the Third World into this country is getting out of hand? If so, in the oft-quoted words of former US President Reagan, "you ain't seen nothing yet!"

For as we begin the 1990s all the signs are that a massive new wave of these 'refugees' is going to descend on us beside which what has gone before will be small beer.

This looming threat on the horizon was starkly illustrated by Simon Jenkins, writing in the Sunday Times on January 21st. Opening his article with an analysis of the problems posed by the present proposal to admit 50,000 Hong Chinese, the writer went on to say:-

> "But I predict that, by 1997, all this will have been swept aside by far more devastating shifts in the world's migrant populations. Already the 1990s are billed as the decade of the refugee. There are an estimated 15 million political refugees notified to the United Nations round the globe. Of these, almost one million are in Europe, excluding all refugees from Eastern Europe. But behind them, dammed up by walls, penned in by barbed wire, marooned by poverty and bureaucracy, are hundreds of millions more."

THE GRAVY TRAIN

Jenkins went on to describe how political upheavals all over the world, combined with economic hardship, are creating an ever greater army of people who want to flee from their present habitats and get aboard the gravy train headed West. All this, he said, is being facilitated by ever-widening travel facilities. "The jumbo jet," he continued, "has turned the globe into one huge job centre."

He then went on:-

> "The impact of the collapse of the Iron Curtain will not be in Russia alone. Already West Europe has turned from net exporter of people to net importer. According to a recent Economist survey, it now accepts more immigrants than the whole of North America. They pour in from Turkey, Iran, North Africa, Sri Lanka, and soon from the republics of the Soviet Union itself. They will be pulled by the magnet of West European wealth, to which they in turn will contribute as migrants usually do, but pushed also from behind by refugees from Arab fanaticism, Indian poverty and South East Asian pogroms."

Said Jenkins: "Neither conservative nor liberal has any answer to this." He went on to describe how migrant peoples somehow always seemed to find a way of surmounting the various legal barriers to their entry to the countries they targeted, and he continued:-

> "For a migrant, transportation is now ten-tenths of the law. A cheap jumbo ticket from Columbo to Warsaw, a boat from Vietnam to Hong Kong, a battered truck from Tabriz or Baghdad into Turkey, a raft across the Araks or the Rio Grande: you may be fleeing repression and torture or just looking for a street paved with gold. What you know is if you get through, you will probably stay through. And after 1992, once into Europe and you are into Britain."

Himself a thoroughgoing liberal and writing in a paper committed more than most to liberal ideals, Jenkins can hardly be accused of giving us these warnings from 'racist' motives. Indeed at the end of his article he asks the question of the 'refugees': "Will we fight to keep them all out...?" and answered: "I hope not." But he then went on to say: "...But it will test our charity and tolerance as never since the great migrations of the 1890s..."

So, we cannot say we have not been warned! A liberal writer, in a liberal establishment newspaper, has spelt it out very clearly for us. This is our future fate — unless we alter our attitudes, dig our heels in and learn to say No.

THE SPECTRE BEFORE US

The implications of this coming wave, as this writer has described it, are mind-boggling. We have already had ample evidence of the titanic problems of racial integration in Britain, with the inner-city riots of the 1980s and the more recent threat to peace and order posed by militant Islam. These phenomena should have convinced us that there has to be a fundamental change of policy on the issue of immigration. But we can be quite certain that this will not happen.

As Mr. Jenkins makes clear, the vast majority of those who get through "stay through." They manage to stay of course for one fundamental reason: the only barriers that western nations like Britain have so far been prepared to put up against them have been strictly legalistic ones. Can they prove that they are genuine refugees fleeing from genuine oppression, or can they not? Can they prove that they are 'dependents' of those already here and granted British citizenship, or can they not? The process by which we are required to find out the answers to these questions is a long and cumbersome one, and totally inadequate to cope with the numbers involved. Just the same problems confront the United States immigration authorities with the tide of migrants flooding over that country's southern border. Who is a 'legal' immigrant and who is not? To stop and investigate every one of them to find out is a task far beyond the resources available. In the end, millions are given the benefit of the doubt.

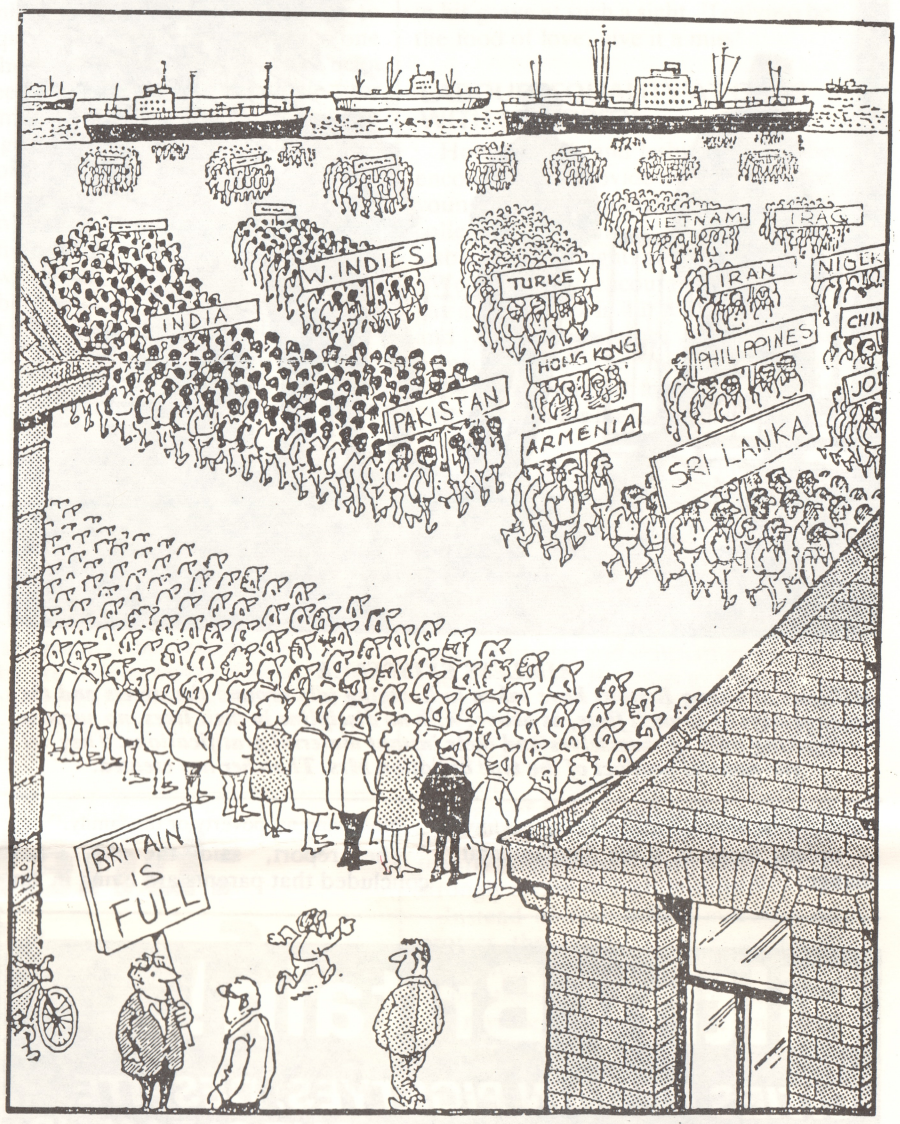
TIME FOR A TOUGHENING OF ATTITUDE

Of course we will only be able to cope with this escalating problem when we toughen our attitude, throw all the legalistic cant and waffle out of the window and adopt a policy towards the would-be immigrants that is unashamedly racist. We should, in other words, decide whether or not they should be allowed to settle within our borders on the grounds of race.

Just supposing, for instance, that a million White South Africans of British stock applied to settle in this country in the aftermath of a future black take-over of South Africa (now much on the cards). Would we try to prevent them? We would be both treasonable to our own kind and also damned fools if we did. Apart from basic race loyalty, White South Africans mostly comprise the very types of vigorous, intelligent and capable people we could well do with. Finding room for them — houses, schools, jobs, etc. — would be a comparatively easy process if we had courage at the same time to remove from Britain the millions of non-Whites presently taking up those facilities.

At the moment of course, no-one — at least no-one in 'authority' or in any other 'sensitive' positions in British life, dares to propose that we adopt such a 'racist' attitude.

But the brutal truth of the matter is that we are going to be forced — forced by the iron laws of necessity and survival — to do so before very long, if we are to have a country to call our own by the dawn of the 21st century.



A ghastly nightmare? No — tomorrow's reality if present trends continue and our Government goes on displaying its pitiful weakness in the face or world pressures

For when this new wave which Mr. Jenkins has predicted begins to hit us, as hit us it assuredly will, the time will be long gone for the usual bleeding-heart brigade to serenade us with their customary 'liberal' theme songs — the poor plight of the newcomers, the 'terror' they are fleeing from, their luckless poverty, our 'obligations' to them, our duty to show 'compassion', etc., etc., etc. ad nauseam.

It will be the time to decide whether we wish to keep Britain in our own hands, to hand down to future generations of our own people — to defend it, as our ancestors have always been prepared to defend it in the past.

If we fail to make the correct and courageous decision — the 'racist' decision — then we will, in the course of time (probably some time in the 21st century), become extinct — as the dinosaurs became extinct. And we shall deserve that extinction — because we will have lost the will to survive. We will, in other words, succumb to the fate that befalls all weak, exhausted and flabby-minded peoples.

There is still time to avoid this. But we must act NOW!

Hong Kong: egg on the Government's face

THE GOVERNMENT has been trying to 'sell' the idea of handing British passports out to Hong Kong Chinese by claiming that it is all some sort of clever trick to stop the Chinese in the colony doing a runner to Britain in the period leading up to Hong Kong's return to China in 1997. The yarn it has been seeking to get the masses in this country to swallow is that the only thing we can do to hold off a flood of panic-stricken Hong Kong denizens between now and then is to lull their fears about the Chinese take-over.

If the colony's millions — or at least some of them — are given passports, so the story runs, then they will be comforted by the thought that they have some document, guaranteed by HM Government, that will enable them to come to Britain if Red Chinese rule turns out to be not to their taste. This, according to theory, will cause them, at least for now, to stay put. The Government of course has not been encouraging Britons to think about what might happen after 1997 if the worst did come to the worst at that time — even if it made any sense to begin with to hand out British passports to people as a means of stopping them coming here.

THE SUPER-BRAT SOCIETY

Mrs. Thatcher's gift to posterity

A DEPRESSING WARNING of the type of society towards which we are heading in the 1990s was given last month in a report published by Gold Greenlees Trott, a leading advertising agency.

The report, headed 'Spoilt Brats', was made following a survey of the habits and aspirations of youngsters in their early to middle teens. If there is truth in the findings of the survey (and we think there is) the future indeed looks gloomy — unless there is some fundamental change.

The Sunday Times, commenting on the report, summarised its message when it said:-

> "Your son is 15. He lost his virginity two years ago, swills Carlsberg Special Brew and slouches in front of the television watching East Enders.
> "His sister is much the same. Both cherish ambitions to earn pots of money; neither cares a lot about the environment, poverty or the family."

The report, said the ST, "has concluded that parents are living in 'an idealised world' if they believe the new generation will adopt the caring, sharing values predicted for the decade ahead."

According to the report, people aged 15 to 24 in 1995 will be the most materialistic and affluent generation in the nation's history. A growing obsession with material success, encouraged by their parents' love for the designer furniture and gadgets of the 1980s, will be inherited by young people.

And, it continues, already today's children are demanding rack hi-fi systems and television sets from the age of 10; by the time they are 12, they possess the material luxuries for which many adults had to wait until they were at least 30.

And most disturbing: 49 per-cent of both sexes agreed that "looking after number-one was the correct attitude to life."

BROKEN FAMILIES

These, said the report, are the children of the 'divorce cynics'. One in three young adults will come from broken families; many others will have their adolescence disrupted by rows between parents that make home life a misery.

More than one in three teenagers will be illegitimate, or never have known their fathers.

And for three out of four girls careers were more important than having children.

For, according to the report, "for a spoilt brat, babies bring hassle and expense..."

Speaking of the kind of young man who will symbolise the 1990s, the writers of the report said:-

> "Aged 15 today, his lifestyle displays the indulgences of adulthood. He has been having sex for the past two years and drinking lager since he was 12; most of his friends drink alcohol almost every day of the week."

The Sunday Times concludes its review of the report by saying that:-

> "By the year 2020, a generation of children — 'more screwed up than any generation before them' — will have grown up and assumed positions of power. By then the brats will be unbeatable."

PRODUCTS OF DECADENCE

Speaking for ourselves, we cannot say that the findings of this report cause us the slightest surprise. The type of society that has been created by Mrs. Thatcher and her predecessors makes this kind of product pretty near inevitable. It is a society almost totally without discipline, either in the schools or in the home. It is a society encouraged to take a greedy, selfish and materialistic attitude towards everything. It is a society tha has no idea of the meaning of duty.

Apart from the appalling standards now seen in the world of education and the lax attitude of so many parents in the home, another factor of enormous importance in creating this slob-like teenage product are the mass media and public entertainment industry.

Controlled by money-grabbing profiteers, largely of alien background, and staffed by more than a small number of people whose trade is subversion, these institutions have created a climate of poison to surround the impressionable youngster in the adolescent years.

There will be no change in the dismal landscape if things carry on as they are, with 'laissez-faire' and 'liberalism' being the order of the day — the gods to be worshipped by all the nation's political leaders, clerics, educationalists, intellectuals and journalists.

What there has to be to put things into reverse is a massive movement back to the principles and institutions of authority. It will need a political revolution in this country to bring that about.

What is clear from this report, as from numerous others of a similar nature, is that British society is falling apart. It has reached an advanced stage of decadence and disintegration from which it will not be rescued by kid-glove methods, by appeals to 'moderation' or indeed by any of the procedures that we identify with the term 'democracy'.

We must act with drastic urgency. And we must act soon!

AIMLESS EXISTENCE
Millions of young Britons have taken to lounging idly around the streets and the passageways of council flats, as above, with no discipline in their lives, no purpose — thinking only of themselves and their instant material gratifications. They are the natural product of the type of nation Mrs. Thatcher has created.

Filthy Britain!

CITIES REMAIN PIGSTYES, DESPITE THATCHER'S TALK ABOUT CLEAN-UP

SOME TIME AGO, Mrs. Thatcher returned home from a visit to Europe and commented on how struck she was by the greater tidiness and cleanliness of most of the cities there by comparison with our own. The Prime Minister promised a big clean-up of Britain, and a short time later an 'anti-litter campaign' was announced with much blaring of trumpets.

Now, a few years afterwards, we have had the chance to see just how successful this campaign has been. In fact, our towns and cities are as untidy and filthy as ever. Nothing effective has been done.

The spotlight was put on this failure by a report in the Sunday Express on January 21st. The report stated that public authorities are fighting a losing battle against the litter-mongers. As the report said, "The battle against Britain's seedy city syndrome is being lost because the authorities have chosen a blunt weapon: the rulebook. As they are discovering, rules are easy to make, easy to break...and almost impossible to enforce."

The report went on to state that there is little deterrent to the litter-louts, citing the case of one man who was found smoking on the London Underground (now illegal) and was fined only 25p! It went on to say that, while the maximum fine for these offences was £400 the average fine actually dished out is only £35. Under a new bill now being put through parliament the maximum will be raised to £1,000 — but it is doubtful whether this will have the desired effect, particularly when courts are so lenient against offenders.

Litter, apparently, is not the only problem. Another is the vagrants sleeping out in the streets. This is now illegal, but in some places, like London, there are now so many of them that the police find it easier to leave them alone.

British Nationalist believes that this country is tackling the problem of its seedy cities the wrong way round.

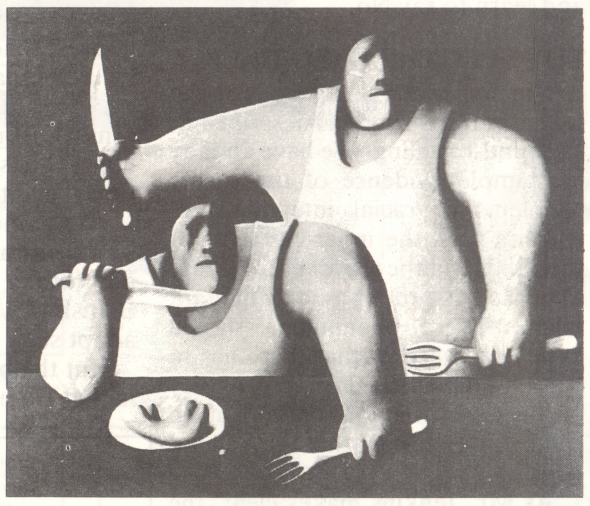
Entrance to London Underground sation, with garbage well to the fore

HIDEOUS PRODUCT OF 'GLASNOST'

AS our front-page article this month points out, a new wave of nationalism is sweeping Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. This is a good and healthy development — as is the crumbling everywhere of communist tyranny.

Unhappily, there are some elements ready to take advantage of the new-found freedom in the countries concerned to promote their particular brands of degeneracy. Naturally enough, they are enthusiastically supported by the people who control our 'cultural' life in Britain and the West.

We reproduce here an example of the kind of garbage that is now being promoted. It is a painting entitled 'Meal', by Russian 'dissident' artist Oleg Tselkov, who was the subject of a drooling write-up by Anna Somers Cocks on the 'art' page of the* Sunday Telegraph *(January 14th).



What is happening in the eastern-bloc countries today is that, with the loosening of the clamps imposed upon the people by the Soviet system, two forces are vying for control. One is the force of genuine nationalism, allied with the forces of cultural tradition and purification; the other is the force of 'liberalism, which seeks to make the eastern-bloc countries as decadent and degenerate as it has made the countries of the West. Naturally, the establishment in Britain will be found supporting everything that makes for decadence and degeneracy.

Let us hope that, with* Glasnost, *Russia and the countries around her, after getting rid of communism, will not find themselves infected by something every bit as bad!

No, Mr. Hurd, it's not the time to disarm!

FOREIGN SECRETARY Douglas Hurd made a not very intelligent contribution to the debate on the world situation when he said last month that it is time to "turn tanks into tractors." He was referring of course to the coming down of the Iron Curtain and the reduction to almost zero of any possibility of a 'world war' between East and West.

Mr. Hurd, speaking to a conference of the Conservative Political Centre in Oxfordshire, deduced from this thaw in international relations that a big cut in defence costs would now be both possible and desirable.

Speaking for ourselves, we could not disagree more!

The first thing that must be said is that the present lowering of the Iron Curtain does not make war between East and West any less likely than it was before — because such a war was never on the cards in the first place. The prospect of it has always been an illusion.

HURD Talking nonsense about arms reductions

The illusion has been created and maintained by our politicians and propagandists to justify the American occupation of Britain and Europe and the merging of national armed forces under the umbrella of NATO and other internationalist military schemes.

All that is meant by present developments in Eastern Europe is that nobody any longer believes in the illusion. While in the past it was possible to maintain a pretence that the Soviets might attack us, now the pretence is shattered.

NEED TO BE STRONG

But this does not mean that we can afford not to maintain strong armed forces.

As one Tory critic of Mr. Hurd has said, "There are something like 43 wars still going on in the world, and we still need to be able to defend ourselves. It is the unexpected that can catch you out."

Precisely. And was not the Falklands emergency just such an example? There will be others. It is still as hostile world as ever it was. There are still threats everywhere to Britain's vital interests. In the face of these threats we still need to be strong.

Stronger, in fact, than we are right now.

Far from cutting our forces, this paper has always advocated that we should increase them — by the readoption of national service.

We need national service, not only to ensure that our young men are trained to defend us in a future war, but also to give those same young men the desired training for citizenship — to get them used to discipline, to toughen them up physically and to instil into them an idea of duty.

To prevent them turning into the 'super-brats' described in the main article on this page.

So we say to Mr. Hurd: "You're talking nonsense." In fact, the kind of talk in which the Foreign Secretary has been engaging is worth fifty divisions to any enemy in a future war. It is only necessary to disarm a nation mentally and morally in order to disarm it physically. Neither bombs nor missiles on our cities are as destructive to us as the erosion of our will to fight.

And we shall end up with no will to fight, for our country and its interests, if we listen to counsels like this.

Queers at the top: is the Government now part of a cover-up?

IS Britain's ruling establishment now hell-bent on covering up a queer cesspit in its midst? Whatever the truth, its handling of the homosexual scandal in the upper reaches of the Scottish judiciary certainly gives that impression.

Just before Christmas, Lord Dervaird, one of Scotland's senior high-court judges, quit his post following allegations of homosexual conduct. These allegations included claims that he may have been part of a homo conspiracy involving young boys and centred on a cottage belonging to him in South West Scotland.

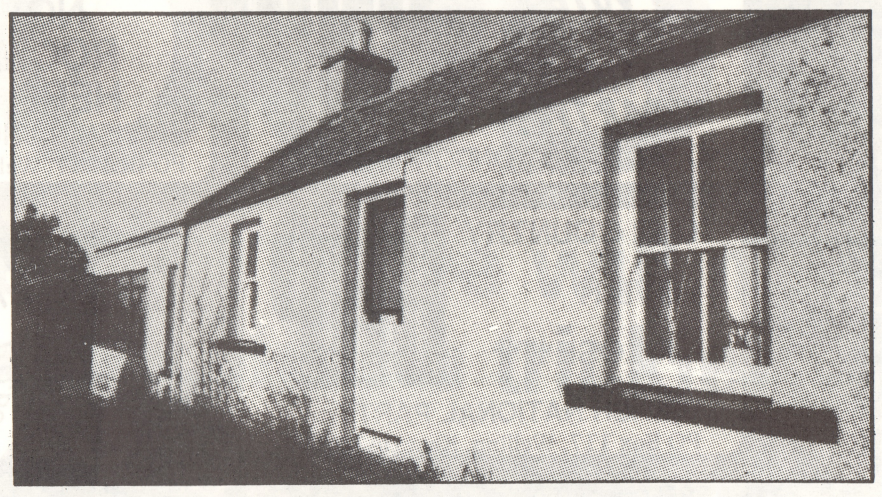
Four other Scottish judges were also linked to the affair. One, whose name was given only as 'Judge A.', is alleged to have been seen in a queer disco in Glasgow in the company of a member of the junior bar. When quizzed about this, he pleaded mistaken identity.

Although the police have no plans to prosecute, saying that there is no evidence to support allegations of homosexual misconduct (the only form of homo behaviour still banned by law in Britain), the affair has left behind a pretty foul taste.

This is hardly surprising in view of the way in which the Government stonewalled against all attempts in parliament — even from supporters as influential as Nicholas Fairbairn, former Solicitor General for Scotland — to force a statement on the matter.

When Scottish Nationalist MP Jim Sillars suggested that homos were being protected in their employment, and warned that the Government should come clean if it were not to be regarded as engaging in a cover-up, Commons Leader Sir Geoffrey Howe fell back on denouncing him by saying: "MPs in most parts of this House will have nothing but contempt for the way in which you have raised this matter." As if that were an answer!

If indeed there has been the kind of cover-up that Mr. Sillars alleges, it amounts to an appallling reflection on our legislators. MPs are, after all, supposed to be in parliament to voice the concerns of those who elect them. For the decent British majority, homosexuality, even though now mostly legal, is not remotely regarded as decent, acceptable or moral.



NEST OF POUFFS?
The cottage said to be the centre of the homo network

SETTING AN EXAMPLE

Judges, above all, are seen as figures to whom no such moral taint as homosexuality should apply. It is not just a matter of the threat of blackmail, although that is certainly going to be present. Nor is it just a question of a homo losing all respect as someone fit to sit as a representative of the Sovereign in judgement on others, although that too is present. Perhaps above all comes the consideration that queers form yet another parasitical network within the rotten 'liberal' society of today whose members are prepared to give practical backing to others of their own kind. Queers on the bench might be expected to favour their fellow deviants and perverts in their judgements, and the end result might well be that the climate of immorality from which Britain suffers today becomes that much the worse for this tendency.

DERVAIRD
Made no defence against allegations of homo conduct

The stonewalling and bullying tactics of Sir Geoffrey Howe and others in the Government towards their questioners in the Dervaird case can only add to the impression that there is in fact something they wish to hide. This was further borne out by one Scots lawyer who said that it was fairly widely known that there was homosexuality among members of the close-knit Scottish legal profession.

Nor is England any better case. A number of English judges are thought to be queers. Less than two years ago one of them, Martin Bowley, who had been tipped as a future candidate for promotion to the High Court, had to resign after he was alleged to have been involved in a homosexual affair with an under-age youth.

In Bowley's case, a whole 'gay rights' mafia within the legal profession crawled out of the sewers to agitate on his behalf. These elements said, not only that the Lord Chancellor should have stood by Bowley instead of, in effect, sacking him, but that he should have issued a statement in defence of 'gay rights'!

Now, in the aftermath of the Scottish homo judges scandal, it almost appears as if the Government itself is closing ranks with Britain's 'gay' lobby so as to minimise damage to it. If so, this can only be either because that lobby is so powerful that the Government cannot act against it, or because members of the lobby are so interwoven with our ruling establishment that it has its own practitioners among members of the Government itself!

YOUR LETTERS

Sir, — So it is coming to pass as foretold from the beginning: a quarter of a million Hong Kong Chinese coming to live in Britain — just for starters. Our pathetic Government that is allowing this to happen is now about to beat all records in duplicity: it expects us to believe that the colony's remaining 5 million residents will meekly await the arrival of their new communist masters and then settle down under them. What a hope!

One can see visions of what is going to happen: of a fleet of boats off the south coast; of Paddy Ashdown waiting on the shore to receive the first floods of tired and exhausted passengers disembarking and lead them off to the new towns and villages that have been built for them; of Dr. Runcie, with his beatific smile, looking on with approval; of sundry Labour shadow cabinet ministers queuing up to buy the newcomers' votes. And where will be the people of Britain? Answer: indoors watching Neighbours on the box!

Only the thin white line of the BNP remains to remind the nation that time is running out fast. So let the cry go up: "Sink the Chink link — it carries a stink!"

P. HAWES
Sevenoaks, Kent

Sir, It is claimed that it is our 'obligation' to admit the Hong Kong Chinese. But I wonder? Recently on Radio Sweden it was stated that 100 Swedish firms with branches in Hong Kong want the Swedish Government to grant the firms' Chinese employees right of abode in Sweden — otherwise, they say, they will all emigrate. In other words, sheer self-interest, rather than 'obligation' is what is behind this plea by the Swedish businessmen. Could this not also be the case in Britain? Could it not be that those who are loudest in their cries about our 'duty' to the Chinese are really concerned just with their investments in the colony?

R.E. TANDY

Sir, — As British Nationalists, we must grasp the significance of the revolt now sweeping across Eastern Europe. Communism is everywhere on the retreat, as international socialism will soon also be. Indeed, as nationalists we may be permitted to pat ourselves on the back for having forecast for a long time what is now happening — history is daily showing that we were correct.

It may be that the destruction of the red menace in Eastern Europe is, in the short term, a victory for the racket known as 'liberal democracy' — but behind this apparent development other forces are moving. I believe that a second revolution will eventually occur in Eastern Europe, as people see that 'democracy' is not working any better than the old system — and that revolution will be a nationalist one.

Indeed it could be that the free peoples of Eastern Europe might before long be in a position to engineer a tidal wave of nationalism that will quickly sweep aside the 'liberal' movements presently to the fore, and present the international money power and its Zionist allies with a real blood-and-soil nationalist challenge.

The Church of England: just whose side is it on?

WHEN the massed ranks of the multi-cultural lobby and the race relations industry put pressure on the governors of Altrincham Girls' Grammar School in the recent Moslem head-scarves row, after the Headmistress banned two Asian pupils from wearing their scarves in the classroom, support for Moslem religious rights came from what some may regard as an odd quarter.

Although the Church of England is well to the fore in wanting to swamp Britain with alien cultures, many people might have expected it to stop short of putting its oar in on behalf of alien religious practices as well. But not so. Instead of supporting his Altrincham colleague's action, Mr. Paul Barnes, Headmaster of the Church of England Community School at Cheetham, Manchester, lashed out against her ban on the two Moslem girls attending school in their scarves (required specifically by Moslem teaching to be worn by women in the presence of men) calling the ban 'ridiculous'.

Many will regard Mr. Barnes' own position not only as ridiculous but as self-contradictory. He is, after all, supposed to be a pillar of England's established Christian Church.

Islam and Chistendom, to which Britain is supposed to belong, have never exactly seen eye-to-eye in matters of belief. In fact, they have spent quite a few centuries locked in life-and-death wars to see whose creed would prevail.

The death-threats being handed out right and left in Britain today by Moslem militants, inflamed by the late Ayatollah Khomeini's 'kill' instruction over Salman Rushdie's novel, are some evidence that there are still plenty of Moslems around for whom this ancient feud remains unfinished business.

One of these, Dr. Kalim Siddiqui, President of the International Moslem Organisation, openly linked the head-scarves row with the Rushdie affair. Calling for "greater understanding" for the death sentence on Rushdie which he himself had advocated, Siddiqui told a major Moslem gathering in Coventry that the Altrincham dispute was like the Rushdie row. He urged his fellow Moslems "to fight for those rights destroyed by individuals who are ignorant of the Islamic ideal." Mentioning the Altrincham Headmistress as one of these, he demanded that head-scarves be "protected from abuse by the host community."

For someone like Mr. Barnes to be found lobbying in the same Moslem cause as the likes of Dr. Siddiqui can only serve to cast a strange light on the present loyalties of Britain's largest established church in this ongoing clash. The complexity may be compounded by a glance at the cross-section of Mr. Barnes' pupils depicted on the left. As can be seen from the prominence of head-scarves, Mr. Barnes would seem to have given his blessing to the invasion of his Christian school by Moslems brought up strictly according to their native customs.

There is some question in the minds of the British public whether there should be any Moslems in the nation's schools at all, as for that matter anywhere else in Britain. But all this may be seen as allowing alien immigrants here not only to have their cake but to eat it as well.

Mr. Barnes, it might be claimed, is just one individual in the Church of England and not necessarily representative of that Church's official attitude. But so far none of the top leaders of the Church, including the Archbishop of Canterbury himself, has condemned his viewpoint. Can we assume that in the centuries-old battle between Christianity and Islam Christianity — or at least that section of it comprising the CofE — has now decided to throw in the towel?

A MOSLEM SCHOOL IN LAHORE?
No, a Christian school in Manchester. These girls are pupils at the Church of England Community School in Cheetham, where supposedly the policy is to bring up young people in the religious traditions of this country. Apparently the Headmaster, Mr. Paul Barnes, thinks differently.

Report from the West Midlands

THE FOOD OF LOVE

Shakespeare's Twelfth Night was decidely a case of "What you will" when its location was moved from "a city in Illyria and the sea-coast near it." In the Birmingham Rep's production, which placed the scene of the play in the Caribbean, the cast was predominantly black, songs were in calypso rhythm and verse was in 'jive'.

We must all bear in mind that it's not all black and white in the arts, and anyway Afro-Caribbeans, as with other racial minorities, have 'special needs' — to which producer Pip Broughton imaginatively appealed by having the actors urinate on stage (simulated of course) — a sick joke which clearly did not appeal to the British majority present.

The Bard of Avon must have turned in his grave at such a sight. If calypso be the food of love, give it a miss!

LABOUR 'EQUALITY' AT ODDS WITH MAJORITY

Homosexuals and lesbians should be encouraged to provide 'role models' for youngsters in Birmingham schools and colleges, according to a Labour Party lesbian and gay rights group, which says: "We will seek to encourage lesbians and gay men to work in our schools, colleges and youth clubs, since they can best provide such role models and the appropriate support for young lesbians and gays and for the children of lesbians and gays."

Such are the values of a political party gone mad.

Massed psycho-analysis is used to direct campaigns of persuasion on these matters, just as those in high places who desire global conquest make use of the mass media to influence young people's ideas, attitudes and states of mind. The Vicar of St. Bottolph's Church in Aldgate, London, believes that gay love is part of God's creation. "New knowledge," writes Rev. Malcolm Johnson, "shows that we are all a mixture of hetero and homo, and five per-cent are exclusively or predominantly homosexual. Many more will be strongly aware of such feelings."

Instead of taking firm measures to protect the young from homosexual interference in the classroom, those in positions of influence are doing just the reverse, encouraging the spread of this loathsome habit.

THE PRICE OF IGNORANCE

In the face of an alleged crisis of confidence and of increasing pressure over the case of the Birmingham pub bombers, West Midlands Chief Constable Geoffrey Dear states that we must still trust our police force. Dear has now added to the crisis referred to by giving his full backing to a massive probe into 'black ghetto' prisons. Furthermore, he was pleased to tell us that: "Britain is very much now a multi-racial society" and that West Midlands Police "enjoy the highest percentage of ethnic officers in the country."

This Midlands probe is the result of intense pressure from the Commission for Racial Equality, which claims that the imprisonment of so many black people (Blacks are eight times more likely to be jailed than Whites) is the most explosive issue facing race relations in Britain. This has sent shock waves through multi-racialist police and court authorities.

The question was asked back in 1955: "How will the economically and politically dominant 700 million people who call themselves 'white' respond to the pressing demands for advance from the 1,700 millions who are called 'coloured'?" Enoch Powell summed it up when he said: "It often occurs in nature that an animal is fascinated or hypnotised by the danger which threatens it and thus fails either to escape or to defend itself while it still has the power."

Modern-day Attilas have taken advantage of the vulnerability of the White Race, and our crime is that we have ignored all the signs of this happening. We are now paying the price. The paradox of our times is that in a world gone mad — racing blindly towards race suicide — it is the minority of Whites who have remained sane who are now being denied their rights.

FILTHY BRITAIN!

We are all in favour of stiff penalties for litter louts and others of their kind — providing that they are rigorously enforced. However, the campaign has to start by making the British people a people with a very different attitude to the question of the cleanliness and tidiness of their areas.

Basically, we have the seedy city problem because we have become a slovenly nation, lacking pride in our towns and cities, in our country and in ourselves.

And, just as we are solvenly ourselves, we are all too tolerant of slovenliness in others. In Switzerland, for instance, very few people drop litter — not because of the likelihhod of getting caught and prosecuted by the authorities, but because anyone standing nearby is likely to object very forcefully. The Swiss are a tidy-minded nation. They take a pride in the tidiness and cleanliness of their country — which makes Britain look like a rubbish dump.

Improving things has got to start with education, with a different moral and social climate, with the drive to produce a different kind of citizen. Unless that is done, all the laws and all the penalties in the world are going to make no difference.

WELCOME HOME, MANFRED ROEDER!

Readers will, we are sure, be delighted to know that the courageous German patriot Manfred Roeder, imprisoned for nine years for his political beliefs in the 'democratic' Federal German Republic, is to be set free on the 15th February. Anyone wishing to send Herr Roeder good wishes on his release should write to: Haus Richberg, D-3579, Schwarzenborn, West Germany.

Our paper takes this opportunity to congratulate Herr Roeder on the attainment of his freedom and to wish him all good health for the future.

BOAT PEOPLE ENTRY OPPOSED IN MONTROSE

MONTROSE was the scene of the latest 'Day of Action' by the British National Party in Scotland last month. The occasion was a demonstration by the BNP against the scheme to convert a derelict local hospital premises into a reception home for Vietnamese refugees. The scheme has aroused widespread local opposition but, until the BNP arrived, no positive steps to organise public opinion against it.

The demonstration took place on January 27th and was organised on the initiative of Gareth Norman, the party's Dundee Organiser. About 20-30 were in attendance, coming from Dundee, Edinburgh, Aberdeen and Glasgow.

Those present on the demo report an excellent local response, with many thumbs-up signs from nearby residents. The event won considerable local publicity.

residents will be allowed to move abroad. Nor will they be allowed even to seek British Consular protection, offered to them as yet another of the IOUs that Mrs. Thatcher and Mr. Hurd have been throwing around with such abandon. In short, Hong Kongers have been told straight by Peking that, British passports or no British passports, they are going to be treated exactly the same as any other Chinese.

Logically, this should be enough to sink the British Government's whole passports scheme. It destroys the scheme's entire rationale. After all, any Hong Kong citizen who can lay his hands on a British passport now has every reason, in view of the Chinese reds' attitude, to sling his hook and come to Britain pronto.

This is true not only of the 250,000 prospective Tory voters to whom passports are already going to be given by Mrs. Thatcher but also of any of the 5-6 million behind them who are able to get the stunt repeated on their behalf. And the latter are sure to find plenty of powerfully placed champions among the multi-racialist fanatics who prevail in Britain today.

But logic, no more than common sense, finds any place in the public statements of either Mrs. Thatcher or Foreign Secretary Douglas Hurd. Insisting lamely that "UK citizens are entitled to (British) Consular protection around the world," Hurd has refused to acknowledge that Peking had torpedoed his efforts by its proclaimed views on the matter. Nor has this led to any new plans on his part to withdraw the passports offer.

TRYING TO FOOL THE PEOPLE

It seems meanwhile that the Government has been banking on a higher than usual level of gullibility among the natives of Great Britain in order to put the whole thing across on them, even at a time when the latter are starting to get restive under an ongoing deluge of Afro-Asians of all shades, to which there is still no sign of any end.

If common sense says that you don't chuck British passports around like confetti if you mean to keep Chinese or any other type of immigrants out of Britain, honour and decency say that you don't surreptitiously hand out blank cheques to aliens, for which your own countrymen and their children will certainly have to pick up the tab — whilst pretending to do the opposite.

As for the Hong Kong Chinese, honesty says that you forthrightly tell them that there is no room here. Peking is right. The Hong Kongers are Chinese by race, and in China they belong. Whatever the clamour that they, and those agitating on their behalf, may raise for British passports and the rights of residence here that go with them, the thing that is needed from our Government is an abrupt two-letter rejoinder — "No entry!"

APOLOGIES FOR BAD PRINTING

AS PERFECTIONISTS, our staff try to make the appearance of British Nationalist as professional as possible, and we are as irritated as readers must be when any part of the paper does not come up to standard — for instance, absence of headings, excessively dark photos or poor colouring, etc.

We must ask readers to bear in mind that production of the paper up to the stage of typesetting and basic layout is undertaken by our own staff; thereafter it is the responsibility of a printing company that is separate from ourselves. It is only fair to this company to say that it charges us very favourable rates which we would find great difficulty in obtaining elsewhere. Nevertheless, there have been a number of examples of very shoddy workmanship in recent issues which we much regret.

Some readers have asked us whether this bad workmanship has anything to do with the fact that one of the printing operatives involved in the company is a leading member of the National Front Flag faction. We have put this question to the head of the company and he has assured us that this is not the cause of such botchings and that the latter are due just to human error.

Propagandists needed!

At a planning conference held in London last month it was decided that the British National Party has urgent need of a special propaganda unit to undertake the task of expanding the party's selection of posters, leaflets, stickers and other forms of visual propaganda and literature. At the moment this work falls too heavily on just a few shoulders, and the result is a slowness of propaganda output that is not satisfactory. We need to share the load more equitably, and we need to bring in fresh ideas and new talents in the propaganda field.

Will all those interested in taking part in the work of this new propaganda unit please write and let us know. Write to: PO Box 117, Welling, Kent DA16 3DW.

The 'Gaddafi' Front collapses

That weird and nutty faction in the National Front internal war known as the 'Gaddafi' Front, and sometimes the 'Cadre' Front, is now formally folding up and going into oblivion.

We have this on no less an authority than the Front itself, which announces in National Front News that the party is being disbanded and that the newspaper is ceasing publication. Naturally, according to the announcement in NFN, this is everyone's fault except that of the leaders of the Front itself.

This faction, which in its time has supported the Ayatollah Khomeini, Colonel Gaddafi and 'Black Power' groups in Britain, has finally collapsed after yet another split. This time the splitters were a 'Back-to-the-Land' faction, who formed a commune to plant potatoes. Some of their former leaders have gone to live in France.

WALES

THE LAST YEAR has seen a surge of British National Party activity in Wales, bringing in many new recruits and laying the ground for a big push by the party in 1990.

Wales has for many years been an untapped source of potentially massive support for the BNP. The reason for this lies in the deep and close community spirit in the Principality. The Welsh folk now face large-scale coloured immigration, much of it originating from England. Close-knit communities will soon find many alien cultures challenging their way of life.

The Welsh people, abandoned by the bogus 'nationalists' of Plaid Cymru (who welcome the immigrants) now face a choice: to allow their culture to be submerged by aggressive alien cultures or to unite with their fellow white Britons in England, Scotland and Ulster in a common struggle for racial survival.

Last year BNP membership in Wales jumped by 40 per-cent, mostly as a result of organised activity for the first time in North Wales. At present the BNP has just one branch in Wales — in Cardiff — and two groups: Nelson (Mid-Glamorgan) and Llangefni (Anglesey).

Even a casual glance at the map shows the importance of the Rhondda Valley region — traditionally a strong Labour area. But the appearance of multi-racialism in Wales has led youngsters in the region to side with the BNP, and there is every indication that the Rhondda will be a major growth-point for the party this year.

South Wales BNP has been constantly active, putting out leaflets and putting up stickers widely — not only in Nelson and Cardiff but also in Merthyr Tydfil, Ebbw Vale, Pontypridd, Tonteg, Caerphilly, Newport, Barry and Bridgend.

South Wales BNP also produces an excellent quarterly magazine, Nationalist Response, which has had articles reprinted in Spearhead and has subscribers as far away as South Africa and the USA. Nationalist Response can be obtained from Cardiff BNP for £2.50 per year.

A lot of hard work has been put in by South Wales BNP, and in this regard particular thanks are due to Peter and Rebecca Fowler, Tony Morgan, Tony Hall and Victor Howard.

North Wales BNP, in existence for just six months, has concentrated activities on Anglesey, notably Llangefni, with leafletting and stickering. High recruitment in the Llangefni area has put the town firmly on the BNP map. Even so, Bangor has also seen some activity, and Rhyl was the target of a 'day of action' when activists from North Wales led by Organiser Alan Jones were helped by those from Merseyside. The team gave out large numbers of leaflets and sold out of copies of British Nationalist.

The publicity from this one event was huge, with the North Wales Weekly News promoting news of the BNP throughout the region.

Not surprisingly, more activities like this are planned for North Wales, and the BNP is set to grow here also. A great deal of the credit for this must go to Alan Jones, who also is a regular participant in activities elsewhere in the UK.

All over Wales, the BNP has caught the attention of young people, who can clearly see that their future prospects are exactly the same as for white youth in Bristol, Birmingham and Merseyside. If massive action is undertaken in Wales very soon, it may be possible to save Welsh communities from the ravages of multi-racialism that have been witnessed in England.

The interest in the BNP shown by Welsh youth gives great promise of the formation of further local units this year. Interest is especially great in the Rhondda and on Deeside (in Flint and Connah's Quay).

With much groundwork done, particularly by South Wales BNP, and with the upsurge of interest in the party all over Wales, the British National Party is set for major growth in the Principality in 1990.

BOREDOM — THE ENEMY OF PROGRESS

How and how not to stage a branch meeting, by EDDY MORRISON

AFTER half an hour or so of delay in starting the meeting, the chairman coughs a little, bangs a home-made gavel and calls the group to order, a sign that at last the meeting might start. He sits (not stands) and looks at the assembled membership seated in the cold, unadorned room, which is completely lacking in 'atmosphere'. His first remarks are a rambling mixture of apologies for absence from Jim, Joe and Fred (who just might be turning up a little later when his favourite TV programme has finished). The chairman then proceeds to another apology, this time bemoaning the small numbers in attendance and giving the excuse of cold winter weather. In the summer the excuse is different — it's too nice a night to sit in at a stuffy, overheated meeting. If these excuses are inappropriate, there's always the autumn excuse: rain and fog!

Finally, the meeting starts, and with more coughing, accompanied by much shuffling of chairs, the chairman announces the treasurer, and then the secretary, etc., etc., all of whom give funeral-like reports on the terrible state the group is in. Then there comes a guest speaker, whom nobody has bothered to ask what the theme of his speech is. This speaker does his best to put a little life into the evening — the only interruptions of him being those of members of the audience going to the toilet or to the bar for another pint (or getting off early so as to watch Sportsnight). The guest speaker finishes, and a smatter of polite applause ripples around the room. The collection is called for and a few odd coppers are grudgingly given to swell the group's depleted funds.

A meeting of the Giggleswick Embroidery Circle? Or perhaps of the Friends of Czechoslovakia, Swindon Branch? No — a meeting of British Nationalists of a far from exceptional nature.

Political meetings are liable by their very nature to be boring. Labour, Tory, SLD or SDP meetings are generally boring. But this doesn't really matter too much — the old-gang politicians are in business to lull the people to sleep anyway. They can afford for their meetings to be boring!

Not so British Nationalists — if we are ever to have a hope of mobilising a mass-following and to win political power in this country one day. If these aims are to be achieved, then the atmosphere at all our functions must vary between the highly interesting and the positively electric! They must be dynamic. They must be stimulating. They must motivate people to become keener and more committed.

CATCHING THE YOUNG

And today the key to political success for us is our ability to bring about the mass-mobilisation of the nation's youth — a youth presently distracted on every side by football, fruit machines, pubs, video-nasties and jungle music. We who mean to win power must provide an exciting alternative to these things.

We must get through to young people in a way that makes them feel that the high point of their week is the nationalist meeting — or picket or paper-sale. Our ideology of action must be translated into deeds, and the place to start is at our own branch meetings, the focal point of local organisation.

Meetings should be at least fortnightly. Banner, symbols and slogans should saturate the room. Absolutely essential is background music, preferable martial, classical or old-time folk — and this should be played before and at the end of the meeting, as well as at any intervals. 'Committee-ism' must be thrown out of the window. Each individual with a job must be made to feel personally responsible for the success of that job. And each speaker, from chairman to guest speaker, must infuse the audience with a spirit of optimism and dynamism — and leave that audience feeling that they are part of a mighty nationalist machine, poised and destined to become a mass movement.

So make your meetings interesting and stimulating. Induce your members, and others, to come — not out of a sense of duty (important though that is) but because they want to come, because they enjoy coming.

If you do this, I guarantee that your branch's coffers will swell, and so will its membership.

Perhaps then you'll reach the point at which you'll hear: "I'm sorry love, we can't get married this Saturday — I'll miss the party meeting!"

SCOTLAND

BNP again makes big headlines

THE BRITISH NATIONAL PARTY hit the headlines again in Scotland last month, when a leaflet drive carried out by Steve Cartwright and Ian MacMillan at a school in the Hillhead area of Glasgow made the front page of the Scottish edition of The Sun.

The report was, as usual, a thoroughly hysterical one, referring to the BNP activists as 'thugs' and 'Nazi hate gangs'. It also featured a quote from local Labour MP George Galloway, who referred to the BNP as 'twisted scum'. Mr. Galloway, readers may be interested to know, recently took part in a march through Dublin organised by the pro-IRA 'Troops Out' movement.

An informant from the school has said that when the headmaster mentioned the BNP a number of cheers broke out!

This was the headline on page one of* The Sun *(Scottish edition) on January 24th, following the BNP school leaflet drive. As In Milton Keynes (see right), it is alright for left-wing teachers to indoctrinate youngsters but when nationalists attempt a bit of counter-indoctrination it is not to be tolerated!

Milton Keynes: full steam ahead!

RISING TIDE OF RACISM

FEARS are growing of a rising tide of racism in Milton Keynes, spurred on and often inspired by the British National Party.

Here the Citizen looks at the trend towards Nazism among schoolchildren in the city and investigates the tactics and attitudes of those leading the local movement.

Below we talk to city organisers and recruitment leaders, while on the right is the opposing view, put forward by a Jewish resident who, understandably, asked to remain anonymous.

A SCHOOLBOY AGED just 14 is leading a classroom campaign to recruit teenagers into the ultra-right wing British Nationalist Party.

It is part of what the party, whose motto is For Race and Nation, claims is a growing support for its radical policies in Milton Keynes.

"Peter" says he joined the youth wing just as what it calls "loony left anti-racist propaganda" was being distributed as part of his school curriculum.

"I had read some BNP leaflets and sent off for more books," he said.

He agrees with BNP policies on tough anti-communist and anti-gay legislation and its main plank — repatriation of coloured immigrants.

"I have got nothing against coloured people — in their own country."

Do his parents approve of his political involvement? "They think I am old enough to make up my own mind on these things."

Richard Fawcus joined the National Front when he was 13 and admits to being roughed up many times for his extreme views.

Now he is Milton Keynes organiser of the BNP and leading a doorstep campaign for local recognition — even

Teenager recruits members at school

● Extreme — local British National Party organiser Richard Fawcus.

MICHAEL was a young man hiking through Germany when he first encountered someone who wanted him dead.

The couple who offered him a room liked him, the conversation got cosier . . . then his host demanded: "What do you think of the Jewish problem?"

Ignoring Michael's stunned silence, his host tore back a sleeve to reveal an SS tattoo. "There," he spat. "That's what we should do with them."

The story is shocking. It is even more shocking to hear Michael, born Jewish, claim the influence of Nazi organisations is now endemic in city schools.

Recently he found library books on Judaism and Islam covered with swastikas. The chief librarian told him both Bletchley and Wolverton libraries face a huge problem with children defacing ethnic books.

Michael sighs: "A lot of people will say I can't see it so it doesn't exist, or they are only children. The danger is they are at such an impressionable age and the pressure to conform is colossal.

"If you go round schools in Bletchley and Wolverton you will find more children indoctrinated with their views than at any time."

More alarming, perhaps, is Michael's assertion that the creation of division in Milton Keynes society need not be as overt as obscene racist graffiti smeared on a wall in Wolverton.

He claims: "What they are doing is emulating what went on in Nazi Germany. First you overload your police with acts of vandalism. You persuade people more and tougher laws are needed.

"What happens then is what you see in South Africa. The Government loses control, power is in the hands of the police and a few politicians.

"The simplest thing to do then is find a charismatic leader."

The words of some politicians and a growing "normalisation" of violence in our society — on the terraces, television screens, after pubs shut — persuade Michael that the first condition, a breakdown of "moral" society, is already happening.

If it continues the media will bear much of the blame, for only through it can the poison — or an antidote — spread.

The recently established British National Party group in Milton Keynes continues to hit the local headlines. Since our report on the progress of the group last month, more large coverage in the press has been achieved. In the Milton Keynes* Citizen on December 28th a full-half page was taken up with an up-to-date report on the BNP's activities in the area, with a picture of Organiser Richard Fawcus holding a leaflet and a copy of British Nationalist. *The report concentrated particularly on the party's drive to recruit in local schools. This campaign has raised a great outcry on the part of the opponents of the BNP. Apparently it is quite alright for them to influence young school students with their ideologies, but when the BNP does it it is loudly condemned!

So big has been the impact of the BNP in Milton Keynes in recent weeks that the party is now organising a public meeting there to be addressed by John Tyndall and other party leaders. We give details of the meeting below — the BNP's first big public event of 1990:-
